The man and his son were being treated in the hospital in Zhengzhou, in Henan province. Local police said they were called to the hospital at 8am on Tuesday after a woman saw the man pouring petrol over the boy. The child was taken to hospital and was "stable", but the man was still at large, the police added. The boy, believed to be three or four years old, is unable to walk or talk and has cerebral palsy. Seven charged A 23-year-old man has been charged with attempted murder and several other offences, local police said. Seven people have also been detained for allegedly aiding the suspect. Fiona Gardner, the boy's mother, told the BBC that the man and his son were in hospital for a month after the incident. "I was shocked to see that they have already used the electrodes to try to burn my child's face, but fortunately he stopped them," she said. "He could be arrested again, but I'm not happy. He's severely disabled, and could die or be disabled for the rest of his life." Police believe the man has been acting alone, but the BBC's James Reynolds in Beijing says the incident highlights the sensitive issue of the right of parents to do anything they want to their disabled children. The law does not recognise a person's right to dispose of their own child's body, and it is not illegal to murder or abandon a disabled child in China, says Mr Reynolds. The woman who witnessed the incident was also arrested and held for questioning. "This is really, really sad. It's just because of the child's disabilities that he [the father] did it," 82157476af
